Report Anti-Jewish Disorders, Arrests, Synagogue Closings, Cemetery Desecrations In Soviet

The synagogue in a Ukrainian city was reliably reported to have been closed by Soviet authorities in May in the Kremlin's campaign against the practice of the Jewish religion. According to these reports all the Torahs (Books of Scripture) in the Synagogue, situated in Chernigov, were confiscated, says the New York Times. A delegation of Jews set out to seek the intervention of Dr. Yehuda Levin, rabbi of the Moscow congregation.

This followed the arrest last fall of a number of Jews in Chernovtsky, also in the Ukraine, including synagogue officials, on the charge that they had participated in "Zionist propaganda." This was based on the fact that during the Passover celebration they participated in the traditional toast to "Next year in Jerusalem."

So far as can be determined, the measures against the practice of the Jewish religion are inspired primarily by the Kremlin's belief that Soviet Jews are under the sway of "bourgeois Jewish nationalism," and thus are bound together. In other words, the campaign may be inspired by political motives rather than by the desire to crush the Jewish religion.

The Soviet Government is against practice of any form of religion, and the severity of its current measures against the Jewish religion may be inspired primarily by political motives. The campaign is centered in the Ukraine, but measures have been reported from widely scattered cities.

In Minsk, Byelorussia, eight Jewish students were arrested and jailed last December for "having organized a Zionist cell." A number of Jews in Kishinev, capital of the Moldavian Republic, were arrested for having violated a government decree and making matzoh (unleavened bread) at a recent celebration of the Passover.

The old Jewish cemetery in Kishinev was recently divided in half, and the authorities are erecting a market place on part of it, reports the New York Times. The dismantling of Jewish cemeteries, including the sale of gravestones for non-religious purposes, is in fact reported to be one of the outstanding factors in the current campaign. Reference to the Jews killed during the Nazi invasion of the Soviet Union also has been obliterated from a number of memorials.

In Bendery, Moldavia, the Jewish cemetery has been dismantled and apartments are being erected on the site. In Voronezh, in the south central part of European Russia, the unoccupied part of the old Jewish cemetery has been confiscated. With rare exceptions the Jewish dead have to be buried in the Russian cemetery.

The synagogue in Voronezh escaped destruction during World War II, when the city was heavily contested, but the authorities have taken it for use as a grain warehouse. The Jewish community has not been able to raise the money required for its release as a synagogue. The windows have been bricked up and the Star of David has been removed from the building.

In Kiev the Jewish cemetery was desecrated and forty-eight of the finest tombstones were broken on the night of Yom Kippur (Day of Atonement), which happened to be the anniversary of the massacre of Jews in Kiev during the Nazi occupation. Although the Mayor of Kiev promised that the damage would be repaired, the authorities have announced that the Jewish cemetery will be made into a municipal park.

The announcement said that the same use would be made of a ravine outside Kiev called Babi Yar, where 80,000 Jews were massacred by the Nazis. This violates a pledge given by Premier Nikita S. Khrushchev during the war, when he was secretary of the Ukrainian Communist party, that a memorial for the victims would be erected at Babi Yar.

The sources report that Jews of the Caucasus, and in general those not of European origin, have suffered far less. These Jews, it was reported, have been permitted to live a religious life, including even some measure of religious instruction, without drastic interference, says the

A.J.C. Calls For U.S. Law To Stop Bomb Outrages

The American Jewish Congress called for a strong Federal anti-dynamiting law that would cover homes as well as institutions and that would permit the Federal Bureau of Investigation to move in swiftly when racial or religious bombings occur. Testifying before a subcommittee of the U. S. House Judiciary Committee, Sanford Bolz, Washington counsel for the AJCongress, listed 77 bombings and attempted bombings in eleven Southern states from 1955 through 1958. All but ten were successful and more than half of these attacks were against homes rather than institutional buildings, he said.

The American Jewish Congress spokesman said the introduction of no less than 40 anti-bombing bills in the House of Representatives reflects the "wide demand" that the powers and resources of the Federal government be used to prevent further bombing outrages. But he warned the various bills differ significantly both on coverage and enforcement. He said the AJCongress does not support a bill introduced by Rep. Emanuel Celler, Democrat of New York, because it would apply only to schools, churches and synagogues.

"Any bill that does not apply to the bombing of homes will fail to do the job that must be done," Mr. Bolz said, noting that within the last four years there have been 35 attacks against Negroes' homes and five against residences occupied by whites. "The deterrent effect of a possible FBI investigation is particularly needed in attacks on homes, because in such cases probes by state officials have been less vigorous than when institutions are destroyed," Mr. Bolz told the House Subcommittee.

Inclusion of homes is provided for in a bill introduced by Rep. Seymour Halpern, Republican of New York, and in similar provisions contained in a number of other House bills, Mr. Bolz said. He noted the Halpern bill is identical with a measure introduced by Senator Kenneth Keating, Republican of New York, on behalf of himself and fourteen other Senators.

In considering enforcement features, Mr. Bolz said, "the essential point to bear in mind is that no Federal anti-dynamiting bill will serve a useful purpose unless it automatically brings the investigative forces of the Federal government into action whenever a dynamiting occurs." The most comprehensive enforcement features of the various anti-dynamiting bills are contained in H. R. 15, introduced by Rep. Celler, and in a number of similar measures, according to the American Jewish Congress spokesman.

Mr. Bolz said his organization particularly supported provisions dealing with threats and false information, which he said would deter the "vicious practice of disrupting the use of buildings through anonymous telephone calls." However, he suggested elimination of a paragraph in the Celler bill that would make it a crime to move across state lines "with the intent" of using an explosive against the specified types of buildings. "We do not believe

Kozlov Declares Reports On Jews Slander On Soviet Policy

Frol R. Kozlov, the Soviet First Deputy Premier, made a statement in which he denied that any synagogues had been forcibly closed in the Soviet Union, while on the plane that took him to Sacramento, Cal., from Washington. "These charges are slander," Mr. Kozlov declared. He contended that Soviet Jews "have a much better life than do Jews in Israel."

Mr. Kozlov's statement on Jews was made in response to a question based on a letter in the New York Times from Donald Harrington, and John Haynes Holmes, prominent New York clergymen, and Norman Thomas, the United States Socialist leader, says the New York Times. The letter called attention to seeming discrimination against Soviet Jews. It said lists of Soviet scientists by nationalities omitted mention of any Jews.

The reporter who asked the question also said some recent news reports had contended that synagogues had been forcibly closed in the Soviet Union. Mr. Kozlov did not mention the omission of Jews from lists of scientists. His statement said:

"These reports on Jews are a slander on the Soviet Union and on its policies toward Jews. In the Soviet Union, Jews, like any other nationality, occupy their worthy place in society. We have ministers and deputy ministers who are of Jewish nationality. We have some prominent men of science, including Lenin Prize winners, who are of Jewish nationality. Many of our ablest artistically creative people are Jews.

"As to the accusation regarding the slights toward the religious feelings of Jews, that is completely a fabrication. They

Israeli Ban On Entry News Evokes Jeers, Jibes, Jokes

The Israelis, a highly sophisticated people who can create wry jokes about emergencies, political crises or other unlikely subjects, are now making up cracks about immigration, a subject generally considered sacrosanct as the raison d'etre of the state.

It happened as a result of a sweeping government regulation banning publication of all information on immigration except for news items officially announced by the government, says the New York Herald Tribune. The order, apparently issued to make sure that future immigration from sensitive areas would not be endangered by publicity, as has sometimes happened in the past, was promulgated as an amendment to the State Security Law, which provides for penalties of up to fifteen years in jail.

Within twenty-four hours the jokes began going the rounds. One of the most popular has it that in the future monthly statistics on Israel's population growth will announce something like the following: "In June the population grew by 15,000, of which 10,000 was by natural means and 5,000 by other means."

Another quip goes like this: Q. Have you heard the latest joke about immigration? A. No. Q. Sorry, can't tell you — it's been censored.

The new regulation also provoked howls of protest. The chief opposition party introduced a bill in Parliament to repeal the secrecy order. The press, including papers representing parties in the coalition cabinet, sharply criticized the rule.

There was general agreement that care had to be exercised in treating so delicate a subject in view of the fact that immigration these days depends not on Israel's willingness to accept newcomers, which is self-evident, but on the readiness of other countries to permit Jews to leave, says the New York Herald Tribune. Gangs Invade Seminary To Attack Students

The Rabbinical Academy, a high school and seminary for Jewish students at 350 Stone Avenue, Brooklyn, N.Y., is asking Mayor Wagner for police protection against teen-age Brooklyn gangs that have been terrorizing the school in the last few weeks. Rabbi Mordecai Weinberg, principal of the school, which has 800 pupils, said the situation is so bad that the gangs were mugging and robbing students on the street and even coming into the school to harass the student body.

One student had his watch stolen only a block away from the school, and another student was beaten and robbed of $10 and had to be treated for cuts at Beth Israel Hospital, says the New York Herald Tribune. Almost daily, he said, the gangs make their way into the unguarded building at night, break the glass panes on the front door, molest students and create disturbances. "Every week we put in a new window for the front door," a school official added. "This situation is getting worse and worse."

The building remains open every night until 11 for students who attend evening classes. About 200 of the students live in a dormitory at the school, which trains Jewish youths to be rabbis during four years of high school and four years of seminary work.

School officials would not comment on the possibility that the school was the butt of gangs because it's Jewish. They conceded, however, that most of the students could easily be identified on the street because the older ones wear beards and many wear skull caps.

Who was more to us than wealth untold.
Without farewell, she fell asleep.
We have lost, but God has gained,
One of the best mothers, the world contained.
For we never knew a heartache,
Till we saw her vacant chair.
Sadly missed by husband, Joseph; and daughters, Jean, Claire, Bella, Sayra; and sons-in-law; and grandchildren.

The Consideration Of Human Pain In Jewish Law

BY DR. EMANUEL JAKOBOVITS, RABBI, OF NEW YORK

In Judaism laws serve not only to train moral habits; they are also used to express concepts of thought. Jewish religious philosophy resorts to legal rules in much the same way as the artist employs his art. To fashion abstract ideas into reality, the painter wields his brush, the musician his instrument, the sculptor his chisel, the poet his pen. Judaism has recourse to its law. The finest Ode to Life could not adulate the Jewish attachment to life more impressively than the simple rule: "If a funeral cortege meets a bridal procession, the dead must give way to the bride." No philosophical treatise could describe the relationship between aesthetic and material values more succinctly than the prosaic law: "The expense for beautifying a religious act must not exceed one third of the ordinary cost."

The Jewish attitude to pain, too, is fully defined only in purely legal terms. Is pain to be countered as a curse or welcomed as a means of purification? Should we resign ourselves to suffering as a fated visitation or fight it? Does the experience of pain justify any neglect of our moral or religious duties? Can it ever supersede the value of human life itself? How far are we entitled to alleviate pain by inducing unconsciousness at the risk of sacrificing spiritual assets? All these are questions to which the precise Jewish answers can only be found in the formulation of law.

In the legal codes of Judaism references to human pain are quite frequent. They can be broadly divided into three main categories: (i) Cases in which religious laws must not be modified on account of pain; (ii) religious concessions for people in pain; and (iii) special enactments to prevent or mitigate pain.

The first group count only one significant law: As a precautionary enactment to guard against "the pounding of spices," the Talmud banned the employment of any medicines or medical treatment, even if administered by a non-Jew, for a person suffering from a mere ache on the Sabbath. But any pain affecting the entire body is regarded like an illness which confines the suffered to bed; for such a patient various Sabbath laws are considerably modified. Exemptions from the ban are also granted for certain cures which do not require the use of medicinal substances. The only other regulation to mention physical distress expressly as not constituting a valid cause for a claim to special leniency refers to the duty to drink the four statutory cups of wine on the first nights of Passover even in the case of a person to whom wine is normally harmful or distasteful.

By far the most numerous references to pain, however, set out the instances in which any conflict between physical comfort and the strict observance of the law is resolved in favour of the sufferer. In two cases even Biblical laws are set aside in the face of pain: Persons in pain are exempt from the obligation to wear phylacteries and to dwell in the festival booth on Tabernacles. But in these two cases the relaxation of the law does not serve the purpose of bringing relief to the sufferer or of minimizing his discomfort. The reason is simply that these particular precepts cannot be properly carried out in a state of distress. The use of the phylacteries requires mental concentration; any distraction, such as is occasioned by pain, vitiates the performance of the law. In the case of the festival booth, again, the law demands that it shall replace one's ordinary dwelling; hence, one cannot fulfill the precept in a kind of residence which one would also avoid during the rest of year owing to the discomfort it causes.

More relevant to our subject are the many modifications sanctioned with the specific aim to save any undue pain. Notwithstanding the above-mentioned Sabbatical ban on the provision of medical aid to people in pain, even several Sabbath laws are relaxed if their observance would cause or aggravate bodily suffering. Under such conditions it is permitted, for example, to open an abscess, to have a painful tooth extracted by a non-Jew, to untie certain knots, to agitate the disgorgement of excess food, and to disregard some provisions to enhance the joyful spirit of the Sabbath.

Special concern is shown for the physical susceptibility of infants as well as of pregnant and nursing mothers. All requirements of new-born children may be met on the Sabbath, so that they shall not be exposed to any suffering. The slightest indisposition or even pain warrants, indeed necessitates, the postponement of the circumcision date. On the intermediate days of festivals a child's hair may be cut if it is the cause of discomfort.

Contrary to the usual rules, women during lactation may relieve themselves of any excess milk hurting them by squeezing it out by hand on the Sabbath, and by suckling an inviable child on the Sabbath or a heathen infant at any time. The laws of fasting, too, are modified if they would involve expectant or nursing women in undue pain. In fact, the law is so solicitous for the feelings of mothers that it considers their pain even before the health of their offspring; hence, a mother may disregard her husband's objection to her eating food for which she craves even if it may harm the child she nurses (or carries). Of special interest is the sanction to administer a sterilizing treatment to women in cases when they fear the pangs of childbirth following previous experiences of difficult labour.

From this list of concessions granted on account of pain — which could be augmented by a few more examples — we proceed to the last category: special enactments made out of consideration for human pain. These are applied particularly to the inceptive and terminal stages of life. Thus the law urges special caution when examining an infant born without an apparent foreskin "so as not to harrow him" by rough manipulation; only the bare hands may therefore be used on the child. Solicitude for an infant's pain following his circumcision is so real that various liturgical modifications were made on the assumption that the joy of the occasion was somewhat tempered by the knowledge that the child was not free from suffering. The pain of an adult proselyte, too, was legally considered; his immersion in ritual waters, completing the conversion, should be deferred until the circumcision wound is completely healed, as it would otherwise be irritated by the water.

Even the criminal walking to his execution was to be saved from unnecessary physical and mental suffering. Before the final ordeal he had to be drugged into insensibility so that his feelings might be spared, and several measures were enacted to reduce the convict's anguish to a minimum — or, as the rabbis put it, to "choose an easy death for him" — in compliance with the Golden Rule: "And thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself." For the same reason any delay in executing the death penalty — called "perversion of justice" par excellence in rabbinic parlance — was severely execrated. To avoid any protraction of the agony of waiting for the end, it was forbidden to conduct capital trials on the eve of Sabbaths or festivals (when executions could not take place) or to defer carrying out the death sentence on a pregnant woman until after her confinement. The sensibility of the mother, however depraved her character, once again enjoys precedence even over the life of her fruit.

So far the references to pain in the codes of Jewish law. But no less significant than these expressions of concern for human suffering is the silence of our sources on other problems raised by the clashing interests of physical welfare and moral values. In particular, there is no sanction for terminating an immediable, agonizing illness at the cost of life itself. The rulings of Jewish law, though not referring specifically to active euthanasia, leave us in no doubt that it would be deemed as sheer murder. On the other hand, the codifiers' silence on the employment of narcotic analgesics or other means interfering with full consciousness proves equally that the consideration of moral competency does not override the anxiety to overcome pain. Even in the final phase of life the concern for a person's ease of mind and body remains supreme. According to the counsel of the Midrash, "even when the physician realizes his patient approaches death, he should still order him to eat this and not to eat that, to drink this and not to drink that; but he should not tell him that the end is near. The patient should be similarly reassured when he is asked to recite the last confession prayer. Altogether, anything liable to "distract his mind" should be avoided. It may be legitimate to infer, therefore, that the alleviation of his pain, too, sets aside all considerations for his spiritual welfare short of the unwarranted violation of any specific law.

This array of legal rules should now enable us to enucleate the spirit behind them and to examine them in a comparative light. Whether pain is to be looked upon as an instrument of Divine punishment or not, it is clearly regarded as a curse to be overcome by man. Indeed, Jewish law often facilitates man in his struggle against pain by modifications and enactments designed to reduce human suffering. Among all the passages we have surveyed, the suggestion that there is some virtue or desirable beau ideal in bodily

MARRIAGES

WITT-GEFFIN

The marriage of Miss Sheila Peggy Geffin, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Ben Geffin, 5164 Westbury Avenue, to Alec Eli Witt, son of Mr. and Mrs. Louis Witt, 27 Holtham Road, took place at Shaare Zion Synagogue, on Sunday, June 28, at six o'clock. The bride was given in marriage by her father, was gowned in white taffeta, made with a fitted bodice; a scooped neckline; and full skirt, re-embroidered with Alencon lace sprinkled with seed-pearl-beads, and a bow with streamers and appliques at the back. Her veil of tulle illusion was held in place by a crown of seed-pearl-beads, and she carried a prayer book adorned with hybrid orchids and white satin streamers. Miss Estelle Steinman, as maid of honour, was in a gown of white organza, with an underskirt of mauve. Her veil of mauve tulle illusion was caught to a crown of white organza; and she carried a cascade of white carnations tied with mauve ribbons. Rena Geffin, sister of the bride, was junior bridesmaid, in a gown of pink organza with white lace appliques; and carried a semi-cascade of white carnations. Murray Geffin, brother of the bride, was best man. Life For The Blind Has Improved, Says Jewish Braille Review

Marked improvement in public attitudes toward the blind during the past two decades is reported by Miss Rose Resnick, executive director, Recreation for the Blind, in San Francisco, Cal., in an article published in the Jewish Braille Review, the monthly literary magazine issued in New York by the Jewish Braille Institute of America and distributed free of charge to sightless men and women throughout the world.

"The humiliating, patronizing, and sentimental attitude of the public towards the blind has noticeably changed," says Miss Resnick, who is herself sightless. "The other day, I was alone, about to get off a street car," she notes. "I had no cane or dog, and the motorman merely asked, 'Do you want me to help you to the curb?' Years ago, he would have grabbed my arm and shoveled me to the curb, holding on to me with a death-grip the whole time."

Progress of the blind toward integration as fully accepted members of society is more and more evident in five major fields, she points out. These fields are education, recreation, travel, job opportunities, and public understanding. The following important developments are highlighted by Miss Resnick in this connection:

Whereas, 20 years ago most blind children of school age were enrolled in residence schools for the blind, today a growing number of them are able to attend Braille classes in the public schools. In this way, "they can remain at home and grow up as participating members of their families and communities," feeling no resentment or distrust for those who see. Today, the blind student has a wealth of tools and equipment to facilitate and enrich his education. He has access to Braille-writers, Braille measures, recorders, talking books, models, and maps.

A vastly expanded recreational life is open to the blind person today. He bowls, he skates, does folk dancing, can enroll at any swimming pool and has more and more opportunities to enjoy camp and resort life. A revolution in free, safe and independent travel for the blind has occurred in the past two decades through the guide-dog movement and improved white canes. Job opportunities have at least quadrupled in the last 20 years. Hardly a month goes by these days without a magazine carrying a success story of a blind person at work on the farm, in an office, factory, or classroom.

Progress is being made most slowly perhaps in the field of public understanding. "Time-worn expressions, such as 'blind fear,' 'blind rage,' 'blind drunk,' 'blind alley,' preserve negative associations with blindness in the public mind," Miss Resnick says. Taking a long view, she is of the opinion that great strides towards social and economic integration of the blind have been made, and that the positive factors far outweigh the negative in the status of the blind today. Giving strength to the positive side are the number of grants available for study and research on the needs and problems of the blind, the increase in government subsidies and the wealth of personal services available through volunteer transcribers, service groups, and private agencies.

The Jewish Braille Institute of America provides for the cultural and religious needs of the Jewish blind and maintains a free circulating library of Braille books and Talking Book records.

Babies do not all progress at a uniform rate. The age at which one may walk differs from that of another child. If progress seems much delayed, it is wise to consult the child's doctor or take him to a well baby clinic.

anguish is entirely absent. There is no trace in rabbinic law of the Christian concept in which "Pathos became Ethos; suffering was a sign of grace, not to be evaded but sought."

The issues in which these conflicting views are most realistically illustrated concern the pain suffered at the creation and at the conclusion of life. In this connection, one remembers the fierce fight of churchmen in the last century against the palliation of the woman's birth-pangs. The opposition to the use of analgesics during parturition did not commence only with the application of chloroform by Sir James Young Simpson a little over a century ago. Nor did the agitation cease with the acceptance of the new drug by Queen Victoria at the birth of Prince Leopold in 1853. The New York Report of the Joint Commission on Christian Healing of 1925 informs us that "before the discovery of anesthesia, a woman in France was detected in an attempt to ease the pain of childbirth with the help of another woman. This was construed as a blasphemous attempt to thwart the curse laid upon Eve, and both women were burnt to death." Towards the end of the last century a moralist of the Church still demanded: "Let . . . our women be trained to have courage . . . and to appreciate their high vocation . . . ; then I guarantee that they will not cry out for chloroform under the pangs of labour but cling with redoubled love and sacrifice to the beings whom they bring forth in pain."

In rabbinic writings the legality of easing the sufferings of childbirth is never even raised. "The prohibition of analgesics," it has been remarked, "would contradict Jewish ideology." On the contrary, as we have seen, the sympathy of Jewish law for the mother in travail was so strong that her dread of further pains in confinement was regarded as a valid ground for recourse to contraceptive sterilization, despite the vigorous opposition generally offered by Judaism — as the only religion of antiquity to proscribe castration — to any interference with the reproductive faculties.

Similarly, Jewish thought cannot subscribe to the view of some Christian theologians that it is wrong to employ narcotic drugs before death — whether natural or by execution — because "they deprive a man of the capacity to act meritoriously at a time when the competency is most necessary." Severe pain, in the Jewish view, can paralyze the mind no less than morphia, even if its effects may be less visible. The exercise of moral judgment is no doubt an ineluctable duty of man; but this duty does not extend to the creation of physical conditions for such exercise at the cost of intolerable torment. The meticulous Jewish regard for shortening and mitigating the agony of capital convicts shows, moreover, that the infliction of pain is not an essential part of their punishment and does not constitute a condition for the atonement of their crime.

Finally, we may briefly consider a rabbinic argument on human pain which sheds an interesting light on an important aspect of our subject. While the masters of Jewish law generally agreed that the infliction of cruelty on animals constitutes a biblical offense, they were in dispute on whether this law could technically be invoked against causing pain to humans, too. Some rabbis could see no reason for discriminating between man and beast in this respect. But others held the opposite view. They reason that "the Torah is concerned only about pain caused to brutes, because they lack knowledge and the intelligence to endure suffering, whereas man can choose to ease his mind and to accept with love whatever befalls him." This contrasts toto caelo with the Christian argument that animals cannot be entitled to strict rights since they are not possessed of reason and personality.

There is also a talmudic parallel for the opinion that, in some respects, greater legal protection is extended to the animal than to man. The law, "Thou shalt not muzzle the ox when he treadeth on the corn, carries the biblical penalty of flagellation only in regard to animals, but not for the imposition of similar restraints on human workers. This discrimination, too, it has been suggested, is due to the fact that "a human worker is different, because he is gifted with intelligence. Similarly, a slave enjoys more legal security against exploitation or degradation than a hireling or free worker. In other words, therefore, Jewish law relates its protective legislation to the need for it: the more defenceless a creature, the greater its claim to sympathy and considerate treatment.

are completely free in the practice of their religion. No synagogues have been closed in the Soviet Union. These charges are slander. There are synagogues in Moscow, Leningrad and Kiev for example.

"I personally know a rabbi in Leningrad. When I worked there, he approached me and asked that the necessary ingredients for matzos (unleavened bread) be put on sale there. We did sell these ingredients and the Jews were free to celebrate the holiday (Passover) in the traditional way.

"I had many friends with whom I studied and who are still my friends of Jewish nationality. The same is true of the other members of our Government. It should suffice to note that the wife of (Marshal Klimet Y.) Voroshilov (titular chief of state), who unfortunately died recently, was Jewish. The wife of the member of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet (Andrei A.) Andreyev is also Jewish.

"God give it that the Jews in any other country should enjoy the same life as they do in the Soviet Union. At the least they live a much better life in the Soviet Union than they do in Israel.

"By the way, there were Jews who at their own request left the Soviet Union for Israel. Then many of them wrote letters to the Soviet Union saying they were having a bad time and wanted to come back."

New York Times. However, these make up fewer than five per cent of the 2,000,000 Jews in the Soviet Union.

The Soviet authorities, moreover, arrested several persons who were involved in an attack last September on a synagogue in Plonge, Lithuania, on the eve of the Jewish New Year. The police intervened two months later when a group of peasants attacked Jews and broke the leg of one of them.

Anti-Jewish disorders have also been reported by reliable sources from the Soviet Union. On the other hand, the centennial of Sholom Aleichem, the Yiddish writer, was celebrated in Moscow last March with public readings and the publication of a Yiddish edition of his selected works. Hundreds of copies were sold in Moscow.

ment to the law dealing with treason and espionage.

The government has begun to back down. Critics had been particularly bitter about the fact that, under the State Security Law, the publisher and not the censor, who reads all news copy in Israel, and is supposed to weed out censorable material, would be responsible for illegal material on immigration which the censor inadvertently passed. Bowing before pressure, the government reversed that provision and made the censor responsible for his own mistakes.

Prompted by the criticism, Prime Minister David Ben-Gurion agreed to meet with the editors of the local press and, while the discussion itself was off the record, the meeting resulted in the appointment of a joint government-press committee to examine the actual implementation of the order during its first month of operation.

This, however, did not stop the barrage of criticism or the jokes. It seems clear that the end of the story has not yet been told.

it is constitutionally permissable to make interstate travel a crime solely because of the intent that prompted it and in the absence of other illegal conduct," Mr. Bolz told the Committee.

The AJCongress counsel also supported a bill introduced in the Senate by Lyndon Johnson, Democrat of Texas, containing a provision not included in any of the House bills. The Johnson bill would permit the FBI to assist local officials in the investigation of any bombing, without regard to interstate transportation or the nature of the building affected, upon the request of the governor of the state or the mayor or other chief official of the place where the bombing occurred. "We believe such a provision would be useful," Mr. Bolz said.

Mr. Bolz concluded: "Violence against persons and property is but one form in which hate-ridden individuals express their irrational drive to maintain racial supremacy and their scorn of any legal restraint. The recent wave of violence in the South, culminating two weeks ago in a shocking lynching in Mississippi, foreshadows the anarchy that could result from long continued defiance by whole communities of the commands of our supreme law. When violence stems from passionate dedication to maintenance of unconstitutional inequality, it must be combatted by eliminating the inequality and by punishing the violence. While supporting measures to achieve the former, we also favor steps to attain the latter. We therefore support legislation empowering the Federal government to act effectively when bombings occur such as those that have shocked the nation in recent years."

PRESENT DAY PROBLEMS OF AGING: A CHALLENGE

the biological, physical, and social sciences. Geriatrics is this but a part, a subdivision, of the broader field of Gerontology.

The objective of geriatric medicine is not primarily to lengthen life. For life has depth and breadth as well as length. This is possible by working for construction of greater health in later maturity, the prevention and retardation of the progressive disabling disorders of senescence, and continued cultivation of the mind through better adult education.

The all important goal is to retain the usefulness of the aged individual for as long as is possible; for the true tragedy of old age is the awareness of uselessness. To strive for this concept is the responsibility of present-day society. All have a part to play.

As the science of Geriatrics progresses hand-in-hand with the rest of Medicine, perhaps we shall belie Aristophanes' complaint that "old age is but a second childhood", and shall attain some Avalon "not far this side of terrestrial paradise".

Present Day Problems Of Aging: A Challenge

BY DR. E. DAVID SHERMAN, F.A.C.P.,
CO-PHYSICIAN-IN-CHIEF, MONTREAL HEBREW OLD PEOPLE'S AND SHELTERING HOME

(Conclusion)

Mr. Albert J. Abrams, Director of the New York State Committee For Aging, in a statement as to the possible role of the University in an aging population, so well said that it is worth quoting:

"The publicly supported State University system has a special obligation to make its facilities available to all qualified to benefit from them, regardless of age. The widespread use of industrial pension systems, the lengthening of the period of retirement and the life span, the improved vigor of our people of middle and later life, the terrifying wastage of human resources in the later years, the new roles of older people in small family units, the improving educational background of our constantly increasing number of aged, all beckon the University to a re-examination of its traditional, almost exclusive emphasis and concern with young men and women. We believe that the State University has a special responsibility for:

1. Opening its doors to senior citizens who can benefit themselves or society by admission to University facilities.
2. Encouragement of research which will open up new opportunities for our older persons to strengthen our society.
3. Training of personnel to equip them to aid the aged.
4. Utilization by the University of the new findings of Gerontology in relationship to its own Faculty and Staff.
5. Teaching its pupils of all ages the varying challenges, problems, and values of different stages of the life cycle so that each one will be better equipped in the art of living.

General Principles In Psychiatric Problems Of Aging

Many of the mental and emotional changes associated with aging are consistent with the life situation. The relinquishment of many of the previous interests of life gives the aging person a sense of impotence. In his desire to keep intact he feels he has little to give out and that everything must be conserved. With time hanging on his hands he may be worried, concerned, and compulsive over small matters. He putters over little jobs. A certain amount of moodiness, depression, irritability and jealousy are quite characteristic. When disappointed he feels in his own impotence that other people do not like him or are working against him.

A person may be sensitive to his less vigorous appearance, falling hair, disappearing teeth, or other evidence of the loss of his cherished concepts of himself. He may become discouraged, give up and become careless of his appearance. Many older people tend to exaggerate physical disorders which are likely to develop with age. A gradual lessening of the acuity of the sense organs such as sight, taste, smell, or deafness may embitter him. There may be increased sensitivity to heat or cold or he may require special diets. He often feels useless, bitter, and isolated.

There are many people over the age of 65 who are physically vigorous, well adjusted, and emotionally comfortable. In the future their proportion can even be greater.

As a psychiatric problem emotional strain accentuates the difficulties of those who are in good physical condition as well as those who are more or less disabled. It is noteworthy that older people who maintain their interests even in the presence of physical limitation are likely to live the longest and to be the happiest and most productive. In the absence of interests psychological difficulties become accentuated.

The aging person feels special need to preserve his individual identity in the face of social threats of uselessness and inactivity as well as those of organic dissolution. What can we do at this time to promote a life of usefulness and satisfaction for aging people and thus help to preserve their psychological integrity? The restriction and disorganization of an aging person's life is often seen to lead to the development of functional psychological disorders and seems to precipitate the onset of organic mental disorders in persons with degenerative disease of the brain.

Sometimes the people with considerable mental disorder may have little organically wrong in their brain at the time of examination; whereas other people who are functioning very well may have considerable signs of degenerative disease. This finding further supports the inference that many of the responsible factors for mental disturbance are not necessarily permanent but lend themselves to treatment.

There is no question as to the pre-eminent psychological need for aging persons to continue their participation in the creative social, economic, and political life of the community in keeping with their capacities and as long as possible. Since work plays such an important part in a person's life the problem of retirement has great psychological significance. The period of retirement which one might anticipate would be a pleasant one, is too often devastating in its effect on the personality which is unprepared for voluntary retirement or too often has retirement forced upon it.

Partial and gradual retirement from work with the cultivation of hobbies and their interests are sound psychiatric principles. The thinking and cultural development of older people who are of great importance in our civilization are worthy of specific and high recognition. The availability of educational facilities for them has been a great benefit which should be further augmented. It is desirable in education not to completely separate the older from the younger people. The former may be stimulated to regain some of the psychological elasticity of youth and the latter learn from the mature judgment of their elders. A more constructive attitude toward the aging can be established when by educational means it can be realized what old people are really able to do. Their record is good.

The multiplicity of the factors bearing upon the psychological health of the aging suggests that the physician will increasingly keep in mind all the facilities available in the community for the assistance of his patient. This includes such resources as available housing, Golden Age Clubs and other recreational opportunities, employment agencies, libraries, adult education programs, visiting nurses, hospital clinics, and sources of financial assistance.

Another psychiatric problem of the aging may depend on family relationships. The natural and basic root of psychological security for the great majority of aging persons is in their family ties. It is here that they have their greatest stake among those whom they have nurtured to their adult years of maturity and responsibility. It is with them that the aging person is so closely identified as to make vicarious satisfactions in their achievements emotionally real at a time when they themselves must limit their efforts. When, however, in various ways, an unfortunate family situation causes emotional difficulties to both older and younger members, indicated psychiatric and other attentions may be helpful.

Needless to state the preservation of good physical health is very important in enabling the aging person to function satisfactorily and to avoid as long as possible the many psychiatric problems which may arise when he is forced into a position of dependency on others. The opportunity for the aging person to live as fully, individually, and productively as possible for as long as he is able may be expected to minimize or even solve many of the psychiatric problems of the aging.

Recreation In Later Years

Enforced idleness can be a major disease. Many an oldster has died before his time simply because he got bored "killing time", could not bear loneliness, and found no reason to live. A good approach to the sound use of leisure is, of course, not to have too much of it. But to utilize the leisure they have properly and healthfully, the aging, perhaps even more than the young, need recreation to keep their lives from shriveling up. Proper recreation for older people can mean much more than merely fun and enjoyment. It can be a lifesaving and a tax-saving program. Recreation has been variously described as the use of leisure to expand the personality; a striving for rounded maturity; something that contributes toward continuing growth. No precise definition is necessary, for recreation means many things to many people.

Older people are often beset with aches and pains that defy medical diagnosis and treatment. Among these are haunting loneliness; feelings of frustration, uselessness, and rejection; boredom and a gnawing hunger for emotional security; recognition, prestige, and satisfaction of accomplishment. Any activity which treats these ailments, be it companionship or the opportunity to express an aptitude or interest, can properly be classified as recreation.

In many cities there are Golden Age Clubs. Others call themselves After-Fifty Club or Grandma's Night Out Club. Whatever name they choose, the mushrooming of clubs for older people all over the country has been one of the most fascinating developments in the field of aging in recent years. So well have they become established as community assets that any city without at least one such club must be considered backwork. Old age clubs are not the answer to all of the problems of the aging, but their immediate value is tremendous and potentialities are even greater. Is this club a waste of time? Is it a silly notion of impractical do-gooders, trying to pamper the aged instead of leaving them alone? The reclamation of a single human being can compensate a community for its efforts, and often it saves society from the costly burden of institutional care.

An old age club with a "welcome mat" can provide opportunities for all the members, whatever their interests and needs. They all provide companionship and a friendly atmosphere. In addition many of them offer group singing, dancing, sewing, painting, handicrafts, games, moving pictures, trips, birthday parties, and special holiday programs. A club for older people need not stop with mere companionship and entertainment, and it usually does not.

Sooner or later interest, among the members themselves, focuses on cultural programs, educational courses, and development of creative skills for enjoyment and often profit. Clubs have often uncovered untapped skills and aptitudes that need only be properly channeled to become of use not only to the oldster, but to his community. One club in Newburgh, N. Y., has a placement specialist at its service who has volunteered to counsel club members. He uncovers marketable skills and experience, and directs them to employers who are looking for them.

Day Centers

Experts in aging agree that to be successful, retirement must be not from but to — to something you always wanted to do but did not have the opportunity or time, such as painting, writing, wood-working, sculpture, music, or painting.

From the need for something more than a club which meets once or twice a week for a few hours, and from the pioneering experience of the New York City Welfare Department in devising a substitute for the workday, old age clubs are evolving into day centers. Beginning with the Hodson Center, opened about 10 years ago, New York City now boasts 12 day centers sponsored by the welfare department and operated with cooperation of voluntary agencies. Other large cities in the United States have similar developments. These day centers, all day long and the week around, permit the elderly who are not working to find a place to congregate, to get off the street, to have fun, to widen their horizons, to learn new skills in the daytime, when the hours seem longest.

Typical of the large city day centers is Sirovich, which serves about 200 old folks on New York's Lower East Side. A 15-minute walk through the Sirovich Day Center shows a variety of programs and a host of interests. A large bulletin board announces speakers for the discussion group, and tells of the need for members in civil defense.

In the main office a frail little lady tells of her desperate housing problem and receives advice. Around the corner, in a small room, you hear the clicking of typewriters as the center's official publication, written by the members, is readied for the press. Upstairs you can smell fresh paint as the props are prepared for presentation of a Gilbert and Sullivan operetta by the dramatics group. The orchestra is rehearsing in the auditorium, and down the corridor, wrinkled but steady hands are sawing and nailing shelves to house a wide variety of life-like marionettes.

An eminent psychiatrist has aptly stated: "An older worker is jealous of his dignity. When a man works for years in a plant making objects which disappear as soon as made, he has nothing tangible left to indicate his expenditure of energy. His only remaining sign of success or failure is the attitude shown toward him by his superiors or fellow workmen. Respect is proof that he has not been a failure. An oldster has a hunger for significance."

This in part explains the need and the success of old age clubs and day centers. They help provide emotional sustenance which the elderly need by making them feel more important in a world which tends to neglect the aged.

Dr. Howard Rusk, rehabilitation expert, has pointed out that organized recreation for oldsters saves both lives and dollars. He cites the example of New York City's Hodson Community Center, which reports that the average life span of those who find companionship and creative outlets there has been extended by ten years. At an age in which mental disturbances take a huge toll, there has been only one referral center. Dr. Rusk adds that needs for hospitalization and nursing to a mental institution from that often decline when patients substitute social contacts at recreation centers for social contacts they previously found only at clinics.

Proper recreation can therefore pay large dividends by warding off senile psychosis which floods mental hospitals with elderly patients; revitalizing the elderly so they are encouraged to supplement their meager pensions or social security allotments; and contributing to the community in the form of service or production of which the elderly are or can be made capable. Our growing army of senior citizens need not be a burden. On the contrary, they can be a tremendous asset if adequate plans are made for meeting their social and emotional needs.

In 1909, the late Dr. Ignatz Nascher, of New York City, coined the word "Geriatrics", to denote a branch of medicine devoted to the diagnosis and treatment of disease in the aged. Although this word is rapidly approaching a respectable middle age, it is only within recent years that it has come into general use. The disorders occurring in older people constitute an essential part of General Medicine. Another new term is "Gerontology". This means literally the science of old age or aging in its broadest sense, and involves the varied divisions of
